For loved ones, a lingering grief

Fallen troops' families endure their own sacrifices.

Frankie Pryor, all of 11, somberly describes "my moments" - those times when the death of his father in Iraq slam him the hardest.

"Now that I'm in fifth grade, it really hit me," says Frankie, whose dad, John Pryor, died 2 1/2 years ago, killed by shrapnel from a mortar round.

"He's really not coming back. He's dead."

His older sister, Danielle, 13, is much more stoic - too stoic, says their mother, Carmela Calvo, a pediatric emergency-room physician with St. Christopher's Hospital for Children.

John led the University of Pennsylvania's trauma team before he returned to Iraq for a second stint with the Army Reserve, this time as a major and combat surgeon posted to a frontline unit in Mosul. The 42-year-old was near his living quarters when the shell exploded. He was the lone fatality.

It was Christmas Day 2008.

"She never brings up his name. She never cries," Carmela says of her daughter.

"It's fine. It's fine," says Danielle; she's managing just fine. She's just not interested in the "corny" grief books and coping exercises her mom uses with her brothers.

Seven-year-old John, whom Carmela alternately calls John John and "my baby," yearns to understand what he is forced to accept.

Before going to Iraq, his dad told John John that he, Frankie, and Danielle were precious and that he wanted to help moms and dads injured on the battlefield return home to their own children. John John wonders, "If Daddy didn't have children, would he still go to war?"

Carmela gently answers, yes, he wanted to serve his country and help people.

"This living nightmare is worse than you could ever imagine it," says Carmela, 43.

Still, she has learned it is possible to move ahead with life while slogging through a death.

"People don't want to hear you're still in pain and struggling - and dealing with it," says Carmela. The family is aching, yet "highly functioning."

If not the enemy, grief is a ceaseless companion for the families of about 6,000 U.S. service members killed in the Iraq and Afghanistan military operations in the last decade.

Of the two million service members deployed to those missions, the great majority have been men, mostly active-duty Army, followed by Marines, Navy, and Air Force. The deaths have come on the battlefield and off, some from fighting, some from accidents, others from suicides and illness.

It takes an average of five to seven years "to reach a 'new normal' following the traumatic death of a loved one," says Ami Neiberger-Miller with the Tragedy Assistance Program for Survivors, a nonprofit group in Washington that helps those who have lost service members.

"A death in the military is unlike any other death in society," says TAPS founder Bonnie Carroll.

"One of the tough things is, when the death occurs in the middle of an extended deployment, it's very difficult to even acknowledge this has occurred," Carroll says. "For many of our families, it doesn't become real until the rest of the unit comes home or after the deployment would have ended.

"It isn't for months that you even feel a normal grief, you feel the full impact of the loss." By then, given military life, it's likely that many friends have moved.

Or if the service member was in the Reserve or National Guard, as is often the case in Pennsylvania and New Jersey, the family may be in a community where there are no specialized support services and few other military families to understand what you're going through.

Over Memorial Day weekend, 1,300 survivors - including 476 children, 235 widows, 260 parents, and 109 adult siblings - were in Arlington, Va., for a TAPS seminar and children's Good Grief Camp.
